Technology has transformed different aspects of modern life into post-industrial countries. Money and payments are no exception. Electronic transmissions have largely replaced paper controls as a form of payment for both consumer and commercial financial transactions. Although direct deposits and thread transfers are two forms of electronic transactions that share similarities, different functions are needed. Many wire transfer operations are actually scams designed to separate victims from their money. The scam artists can request to deposit a check from them to your bank account, and connect their money to cover control. Other scams involve money reasons from people with whom the victim has formed a romantic online relationship, online services of "Vacation Rental" or sellers who insist on payment by bank transfer. However, a bank transfer is like cash - once you started the bank transfer, it's almost impossible to cancel the transaction or to get your money back. "The opportunities today wireless are much, much bigger than I saw in the computer business in 1983. Today's opportunities are ten times higher," says Philippe Kahn CEO of LightSurf Inc., a Santa Cruz, California company, who produces wireless web software. And you should know. In '83, Kahn was a pioneer software developer who quickly created two great hits-SideKick and TurboPascal-and then dug a lasting place in technology history. But, he says, the possibilities found in the landscape of wireless information are much richer than he saw in 1983. For a very simple reason, really: "The numbers were so much smaller then," explains Kahn, who recently sold its TrueSynch-technology to synthesize the data between devices such as mobile phones and computer-to the Motorola mobile giant for an unclosed amount. In the early 1980s, PC users were radiated, which meant that the top market was funda-mentally tiny. But today, he says, the public potential for wireless web products and services is already in tens of millions of users. Kahn says: "Today's landscape is explosive."
