Let us pick a word search games for you! Where did it all begin? Word searches seem like such a commonly played and popular puzzle that you might find it hard to believe that they were only created in 1968! This makes word search puzzles quite new in comparison with crosswords, sudoku or most other word games. Who invented word searches? According to Wikipedia, Norman E. Gibat originally designed and published the first word search puzzle in 1968 in Norman, Oklahoma. He is normally credited with their invention in the US, although a Spanish puzzle creator was publishing what he called a "Soup of letters" before that. These humble beginnings in a small want-ad digest in a small town, was distributed free to other stores in town. The puzzle was immediately very popular, and several more followed. Teachers in local schools began to realise that this is an ideal puzzle format to keep kids focused, and asked Gibat for extra copies. From these humble beginnings as a twenty by twenty puzzle with the names of Oklahoma cities, teachers mailed it to other teacher friends around the country and the distribution blossomed into the ubiquitous presence we know today. As the puzzles grew in popularity, syndicators created books of puzzles and they found wide-spread adoption in newspapers around the world. With the advent of the internet, it became a popular desktop app, and then a mobile game as companies developed ways for people to play at any time or create their own word search puzzles. Used by Teachers Teachers and parents are the main users of word search puzzles in a classroom environment, particularly those teaching children or English as a second language. Word searches offer learners a different method of instruction that combines hands-on tactile learning with word identification, sorting, and strategy. It's also a low-pressure way to get students back to school and immersed into the material, or simply as a quick break for the teacher while they need to do other things. Have you ever wanted to know more about word search puzzles but were too afraid to ask? We've got you! A word search is a grid of random-looking letters, which have hidden words located within the grid. These words can be arranged vertically, horizontally, or diagonally, and they may also be reversed. The goal of the word search is to find all of the hidden words contained in the grid. There are three main audiences for word search creation:Teachers: Teachers create a LOT of word searches. It's a great way to introduce an easy refresher on the material that has just been covered, which helps students who have different learning styles. Particularly when teaching language and vocabulary, a puzzle is a great way to have students identify word patterns.Workplaces: It is not always easy to get adults to engage with training exercises, and introducing a word search is a very easy way to get your crew to absorb more of the material for meetings, training sessions, or even just for fun like with a holiday word search.Individuals: Maybe you have a friend's birthday coming up and want a game to play? Maybe you just need to keep your kids entertained for a few minutes while you're doing something else? Word searches are the perfect solution.
