paracord, also known as parachute cord or type III cord, is one of the most versatile and essential items for any EDC (everyday carry) or survival kit. Its high-tech materials and construction enable it to be lightweight, strong, and compact, making it an ideal choice for various applications.###ARTICLEParacord - Understanding the Differences and Choosing the Right OneParacord is a high-quality U.S.-made material that consists of 7 yarns, each with 2 strands per strand, making it plenty strong enough for many uses. Although some may have concerns about its durability, I've found it to be reliable after years of use, but opinions on this matter vary. If you prioritize buying authentic military-grade products, at least you'll have accurate information to make informed decisions; however, if you're looking for a dependable option without breaking the bank, commercial 550 U.S.-made paracord is a suitable alternative. Proper storage is crucial in extending the lifespan of paracord. UV light exposure can cause degradation over time, but it happens very slowly. In addition to avoiding direct sunlight, using paracord minimally and storing it away from abrasive materials can help minimize damage. Considering paracord's nylon composition, which offers mildew resistance and humidity protection, it's essential to keep it in a cool, dry place within a waterproof bag or container. When selecting a storage location for your stockpile or long-term food supplies, this knowledge can be beneficial. Inspect your paracord regularly for signs of wear and tear, such as fraying, especially if you plan to use it on critical applications. The 100 feet of paracord can translate into approximately 800 feet of usable cordage, making its multiplicative abilities an essential consideration when deciding whether to include it in your gear.
