Probably a ship or a person. Well, let me tell you that the ramparts of Fort Saint-Jean were covered with many people when a new ship arrived in port, especially one that was built and loaded at old docks. I think it might have belonged to someone from this city. But we didn't know for sure because its owner had disappeared along with some others, and no one has seen them since. It's like when you find something very exciting, but then you start thinking about who the person is that really owns it. Maybe they want it before anyone else can take care of it? Some people think this way, especially if they're trying to sell things in newspapers. The person who found a special book was happy, but also worried because they thought someone might be looking for it before they could tell their friend. You see, when the owner of a big place like a silver mine is going to a meeting, sometimes they meet people on the road and those people want something from them. It's like when Pinocchio became a donkey and was bought by a circus person who wanted him to do tricks. Now, about the other day when I walked through a park, it was very nice. The sun shone brightly, and birds were singing in trees. But then I saw someone walking alone on the beach, looking at something they found on the sand. They looked like they had discovered something precious. He reckoned with certainty that among those untamed wildernesses, he wouldn't be able to overcome such a journey without encountering something truly remarkable.
